Lakewood Heights’ Beautification

Written by Angela Huynh

On a warm Saturday morning from 9 am to 12 pm, eight Earth Tomorrow Club members participated in Trees Atlanta’s weekly community service event in the Lakewood Heights neighborhood, just south of Atlanta. Some students were a little apprehensive driving there, not knowing what to anticipate: were they simply going to plant trees or do strenuous manual labor? On 8th Lethea Street, a massive heap of mulch lay before them. Mulch is the wood-like chips on playgrounds during recess, used to retain moisture in the soil and improving its fertility. This mountainous pile just happened to lay right next to the program coordinator’s house. Two trucks swung by carrying vacant black buckets and worn shovels and students were promptly put to work. Students and other volunteers alike shoveled through the intimidating mass of mulch, filling empty buckets up to the brim. Afterward, students were transported to a road minutes away. Rows of trees situated along the sidewalks.

Students for the next few hours, would pull out and remove pesky weeds along the trees before pouring the same mulch over the soil. Through this experience, students were able to gauge their interests in horticulture and garden management, all while being in closer involvement with their community. At the end of the service event, students attended a mini, impromptu cookout. Everyone, albeit tired, was able to unwind and bask in the satisfaction that their good deeds would pay off in the incoming months. If you do decide to visit Lakewood Heights and just so happen to pass by the same trees these volunteers work on, know how much effort and dedication they have put in the beautification of their communities. Whether they are one-time volunteers or even as consistent as weekly volunteers, these members can say assuredly that they gained complete satisfaction that day.
